THEY CLIMBED MOUNT ARARAT.

Two Micehists Place the United States Flag on Its Summit.

Allen and Schulten, the Americans who are making a tour of the world on bicycles, have made a signal demonstration of their pluck and endurance by ascending Mount Ararat without guides in the face of great difficulties. Traversing Asia Minor from Constantinople by way of Angora, Concar and Erzurum, they reached Bayazid, near Mount Ararat, June 28, intending to climb this famous mountain. In Bayazid they passed four days in buying their provisions and making preparations.

The day before they were to make the attempt two European travelers arrived from Yerevan, a Greek, of Salonica, on his way to Persia, and the other a Swiss artist, Mr. Hoff, from Meran. Mr. Hoff is a member of an Alpine club and is familiar with the methods of mountain climbing in Europe. He thought the season altogether too early for the attempt, and the ice and snow would be insurmountable. The Americans, says the New York Sun, however, were not to be discouraged. On the contrary, they urged the gentlemen to accompany them, and the following day the party started for the mountain with baggage, animals, a servant and Turkish guards. They had no guide and depended upon the information furnished by the notes of a traveler and their own common sense.

The mountain cannot be seen from Bayazid, as the town lies in a valley behind a high range of hills. On emerging from this valley upon the level plain Mount Ararat rises in clear view, covered with pure white snow. They had little trouble the first day, and reached a Kurdish village, where they passed the night. On the second day everything seemed to combine to fix the endurance of the party. At night they camped at an elevation of 10,000 feet, and on the third morning the Americans found themselves obliged to shoulder their bedding and food, and in company with Mr. Hoff, to proceed to their second camp, as their other companions were not willing to venture further. It was a hard day's work, and the improvised camp afforded little opportunity for rest or repose, so they were far from fresh for the last day's effort.

Starting out from their camp at four a. m., on July 3, they pushed on, gasping for breath and often obliged to lie down and rest, until 1:30 p. m., when, almost exhausted, they reached the summit of the mountain. During the last twenty-seven hours of the climb they could find no water, and were obliged to quench their thirst with snow. Their way, too, was full of danger, as they made the last 8,000 feet of the ascent on the verge of a tremendous gorge, where a single step or one weak place in the snow would have proved fatal. Reaching the top, they planted a small American flag on an iron-pick and fired a salute with their pistols in honor of the glorious Fourth.

The top of the mountain is a snow field of three or four acres, with four prominent peaks. The view was indescribable in its grandeur and extent, but in a few moments after their arrival the usual afternoon storm came on and the summit was enveloped in clouds. The descent was made in safety and comparative ease, and the tourists were received with great honor by the Turkish governor of Bayazid.

The ascent of Mount Ararat is not often made, as this mountain is far from the ordinary line of the world's travel. It is reported that two Russian, two German and two English parties have reached the top, but no American had hitherto made the attempt.
